THE ABBY ALDRICH ROCKEFELLER SCULPTURE GARDEN

One of New York's most delightful outdoor spaces, The Abby Aldrich Rockefeller Sculpture Garden is celebrated for its setting of sculpture, trees, fountains, and reflecting pools. Refurbished in 1989 in honor of its fiftieth anniversary, the Garden has been a unique feature of The Museum of Modern Art since it opened in its permanent home in 1939.

The current Garden, designed in 1953 by Philip Johnson, was named in honor of the late Mrs. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., one of the founders of the Museum. Through the Museum's expansions in 1964 and 1984, the Garden has remained in design and spirit true to Johnson's original scheme.

The Sculpture Garden is divided into three areas: an east terrace, a central sunken garden, and a terrace to the west. Another terrace overlooks the main garden from the second-floor Members Dining Room at the Garden's east end. Groves of European cutleaf birch, little-leaf linden, and weeping beech are planted in beds in several areas, and English ivy, used throughout as ground cover, lends unity. London plane trees, Andromeda, and a variety of seasonal plantings contribute to the overall harmony of art with nature.

Sculpture from the Museum's collection on view include such masterpieces as Henri Matisse's The Backs; Henry Moore's Animal Form; Claes Oldenburg's Geometric Mouse, Scale A; Pablo Picasso's She-Goat; Auguste Rodin's Monument to Balzac; and David Smith's Cubi X, as well as contemporary works by Joel Shapiro and William Tucker (complete list of works attached). Annual support for seasonal plantings is provided by grants in memory of Gardner Cowles, a late trustee.
