THE MUSEUM OF MODERN ART
NEW YORK

FOREWORD

From the letter of invitation to those who chose the paintings and sculpture from sixteen American cities:

"The Museum of Modern Art is planning an exhibition in which we invite you to collaborate.

"During recent years New York has assumed a rôle in the American art world of greater importance, many feel, than its achievement deserves. Most of the currents which flow from Europe to America pass through New York and radiate from there throughout the country. This traffic has been too often a one-way affair. We feel that an effort should be made to restore a more even balance of trade. To do this in a concrete way we are proposing that instead of our sending you an exhibition you should send us one.

"We are planning, therefore, a show which will be called 'Painting and Sculpture from Sixteen American Cities.' Unfortunately our Museum is not very large so that we can show only small groups from each city. There will be altogether about a hundred paintings and about twenty works of sculpture. A few of the larger cities such as Chicago and Philadelphia will be asked to send as many as ten or twelve paintings but most of the smaller cities will be invited to show about half that number. It will not be necessary to restrict the choice to artists who live within the city limits; whatever artists think of your city as their artistic center may be considered. If possible the paintings from each city will be hung together.

"It is hoped that each representative will select what he himself believes to be the best from his city, disregarding whenever necessary conventional opinion. The Museum of Modern Art does not wish to influence the choice of works of art in any way—with one exception: if possible the works of art should have been finished within the last five years."

The response to this invitation was enthusiastic; but most of those who had been asked to select the works of art made one condition: that they should remain anonymous, in order that their choices might be as independent as possible. The fact that their names cannot be listed here increases the indebtedness felt toward them by the Museum of Modern Art.

The President and Trustees of the Museum of Modern Art wish to thank not only these representatives in each of the sixteen cities but also the lenders—museums, collectors, dealers and artists—for their generous contributions to the exhibition.

MUSEUM PUBLICATIONS

The books published by the Museum of Modern Art in connection with its numerous exhibitions form a concise library of living art, painting, sculpture, and architecture. The critical and historical notes, explanations by the artists, biographies and bibliographies contain information not readily found elsewhere. There is a wealth of illustration—over 893 plates of the work of over 300 modern painters, sculptors and architects. The Museum makes no profit on these books. It sells them considerably below the cost of production, as a part of its educational service to students and the public.
