Exhibition Brings Together Works from the Museum's Collection, Photographs by Ordinary New Yorkers and Visitors, and a Creative Response to the Events of September 11

Life of the City

Photographs Accepted at MoMA beginning February 1, 2002

Exhibition on View from February 28 to May 21, 2002

WHAT: Life of the City—an exhibition opening February 28, 2002 at The Museum of Modern Art—is both a tribute to New York City and an exploration of photography's role in shaping a community. The first of three components presents more than 150 outstanding New York photographs from the Museum's collection. The second component is a revolving display of photographs contributed by New Yorkers and others—amateurs and professionals alike—to express their relationships to the city. Completing the exhibition is a digital display of the thousands of photographs assembled by Here is New York, an extraordinary photographic initiative created in response to the events of September 11. Life of the City is organized by the curatorial staff of the Museum's Department of Photography with the generous cooperation of the organizers of Here is New York.

Life of the City celebrates New York. By bringing together landmarks of modern art and ordinary snapshots, the exhibition also probes a common denominator of photography. "To make a photograph is to point out something that matters," says Peter Galassi, Chief Curator, Department of Photography. "That is just as true whether the photographer is an accomplished artist or an ordinary citizen. The exhibition is an experiment. We hope it will tell us how people feel about the city. Perhaps it will also teach us something about photography."

For more than a century, photographers have loved to make pictures of and in New York City. They have captured the vitality of the city—its energy, ambition, turmoil, and grit—and its beauty. Selected to stress the richness and diversity of this collective achievement, the first component of Life of the City includes works by dozens of photographers, including Berenice Abbott, Henri Cartier-Bresson, Philip-Lorca diCorcia, Lee Friedlander, Helen Levitt, Irving Penn, Cindy Sherman, Edward Steichen, Alfred Stieglitz, James Van Der Zee, Weegee, and Garry Winogrand.

On the opposite walls of the gallery, informally mounted with pushpins and regularly refreshed to make room for recent arrivals, is a display of photographs contributed by New Yorkers and visitors to the city. Each person is invited to contribute one photograph that expresses his or her relationship to New York City. Conditions of participation are detailed below.

Here is New York: A Democracy of Photographs was initiated by Alice Rose George, Gilles Peress, Michael Shulan, and Charles Traub. On September 28, 2001, in a vacant store in Soho, they began collecting photographs of the events of September 11 and its aftermath. The pictures were scanned into a computer database, from which volunteers could make inkjet prints for display and sale at $25 each. The ever-mounting proceeds contribute to the 9/11 Children's Aid Fund. Here is New York rapidly became a place where New Yorkers could come together in a time of distress. Its growing collection of thousands of photographs will be displayed digitally in Life of the City. The presentation of Here is New York is made possible by The Andy Warhol Foundation for the Visual Arts.
