FOREWORD

It is especially appropriate that the Museum of Modern Art should attempt the first general international survey to be undertaken in America of the particular aspects of modern art revealed by draftsmanship. Drawings have often figured prominently in the Museum's exhibitions and as early in its career as 1933 it held an exhibition of drawings by sculptors. The Museum is fortunate in the possession of a permanent collection of more than three hundred drawings, including many presented by Mrs. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Miss Lillie P. Bliss, Mr. Edward M. M. Warburg and many generous donors.

The undertaking was not an easy one; the field is vast, and drawings are more widely scattered in individual collections than paintings and sculptures, and less well documented in books and periodicals. But through the generosity of other museums and private collectors it has been possible to arrange this representation of the drawing of our time and, in spite of the hindrances of war, to show the principal phases of the contemporary movement.

The lack of a bibliography on modern drawings has often been observed, and for this reason Mr. Bernard Karpel, Acting Librarian of the Museum of Modern Art, has prepared for this volume a somewhat more copious list of reference works than is customary, to assist those who may be prompted to make further studies. Drawings after all provide the best training ground for the new collector. Works by the artists who will be the important figures of the next decade are often acquired for modest sums. And, since the investment is not a large one, it is an activity which may be constantly renewed. The purchase of original drawings may require more courage and understanding than any other form of collecting but it can be wonderfully rewarding.

MONROE WHEELER
Director of the Exhibition

MODERN DRAWINGS

"... drawings are invaluable, not only because they give in its purity the mental intention of the artist, but because they bring immediately before us the mood of his mind at the moment of creation."

Goethe, in these words to Eckermann, speaks as a lover of drawings. Naturally the draftsman himself has a different point of view according to the use he may make of his drawings and his purpose in making them. For him there are three main types of draftsmanship: (1) the occasional sketch, (2) the preparatory study, and (3) the definitive drawing of finished artistry, an end in itself, probably undertaken with the connoisseur's pleasure in mind in the first place.

THREE KINDS OF DRAWINGS

The occasional sketch. The artist almost always sketches at random whatever happens to attract his eye or fleetingly arouse his imagination, and he usually keeps these pages for future reference: a store of chance discoveries, inspirations of the moment, little lines full of life, plays of light and shadow, by which, when the time comes, he can verify some detail of a more important work; or out of which, in the gradual process of art, the concept and composition of painting or sculpture may arise and develop. Obviously a piece of paper is a freer, more practicable means of exploration than canvas or clay; so that, among other things, draftsmanship is the artist's day-dreaming and soliloquy, his examination of artistic conscience, without pretense or self-deception. There is no more severe test, or clearer revelation, of his abilities. As Redon expressed it, "the more ambitious study does not give as enduring results as those fragmentary passages that come without thought of composition. It is not the ambitious study that the artist will consult when he needs reliable help. The naive study, when one forgets what one knows and approaches what one sees with humility, remains a real document, fruitful, inexhaustible in its lessons, and one that will never tire."

The preparatory study. When drawing is consciously a part of an artist's preparation for a given major work, the plan in his mind must have achieved a certain maturity or at least distinctness. Then there is no relaxation to the little beckonings of reality around him, or to visual instinct and manual dexterity as they may happen to prompt him. He has decided what he wants, he knows his way. By deliberate experiment, variation, or exercise—by rehearsing some difficult or crucial detail, or his pattern as a whole, over and over until it is perfect—he approaches the day of final execution in his chosen medium. The development of Matisse's White Plumes from drawing to drawing (pages 50 and 51), and the studies for Picasso's Guernica (pages 86 and 87) and for Tchelitchev's Hide and Seek are among the most impressive and instructive demonstrations of modern esthetic method.

Drawing for its own sake. Some artists think of drawing as an end in itself. Only a few, however, have the necessary virtuosity, assurance of form, linear precision, and cunning of hand to excel in this form of expression. Their great nineteenth-century prototype is Ingres. For some reason, perhaps economic, this kind of draftsmanship, complete in itself, is often portraiture. Picasso and Tchelitchev, Dali and Cădmus, have at times made a speciality of it. But they too, like Redon, have done what was not uncommon in past periods: invented intricate compositions or poetical or dramatic scenes, entire and final.*

MODERN DRAWING

The purpose of the present selection of drawings is not a final or even an altogether just presentation of the work of modern artists, man for man according to the amount, or beauty, or originality of the work each has done. It is rather intended to offer a general view of the draftsmanship of our time, with its background in the previous century; the outlines or, at least, the salients of the common accomplishment in this medium; and perhaps clues of styles ahead.

Draftsmanship is simpler to define than most terms of art. To draw is to record an object or model or scene or imaginary conception by linear means, rather than by volume or surface values. Most drawings are in black and white, but an image composed of colored lines is draftsmanship if it depends on the line primarily instead of its color; whereas there are pictures in black and white, with shadings and modelings of gray, which are scarcely drawings at all. The clearest manifestation of drawing as linear expression is to be found in pen and ink, pencil and silverpoint. This constitutes the point of departure from which, little by little, drawing approaches painting. Charcoal or sanguine may soften or thicken the outside outlines so that volumes and values develop as it were of their own accord. On the other hand, drawings may be adorned with a good deal of color with no diminution of the linear character, as in the work of Paul Klee. But art is forever interrelating and overlapping; it is vain to subdivide it in our studies more than the artist would himself, so the present survey ranges from pure line drawings to works where line is almost submerged in the tones and colors of the media.

The word modern, in strict usage, is a matter of time, not of style. In a consideration of history it is the present tense, that is all. Just as everything that is encountered in nature can be called natural, whatever develops in the human spirit or habit of mind contemporaneously with ourselves is modern; and this applies to modern art as well.

It is not, however, meaningless as a descriptive or qualitative adjective. But the meaning is plural; it embraces several distinct movements, standpoints in opposition and rival predilections of thought and emotion and technique: expressionism, abstraction, surrealism or dream-realism, to name the more obvious. They have had something in common, but not much. The artists who led them all showed great conviction, enduring unpopu-

* In book-illustration there is a numerous category of drawing closely related to this last—only not independent in subject matter—which has been considered in a previous Museum of Modern Art publication: Painters and Sculptors as Illustrators, edited by Monroe Wheeler. larity in their day. They all refused to submit to the traditions of the academies in which they had their esthetic education; or to that standard of representational exactitude which the invention of photography seemed to impose on everyone.

THE NINETEENTH-CENTURY INHERITANCE

Modern drawing is, of course, part of universal tradition. It is naturally not possible to give a certain date for the commencement of the modern movement as we know it. It arose at several points and different times, like the springs and rivulets of a river which cannot be marked exactly on any map. Certainly it was before 1900. In general the significant aspects of the modern movement became apparent in the early eighties. About 1885 Gauguin freed himself from Pissarro's influence and began his search for the ornamental line that was to lead to Art Nouveau. At the same time the short-lived but influential Seurat was creating his stately formalities; and Renoir went to Italy to study the masters of the Renaissance before devising the style which he was to practice in the new century. He soon abandoned his experiments in the precise mode of Ingres, preferring from then on soft, elusive sanguine and chalk to pencil or pen and ink. Degas, who was the truest successor to the linear clarity of Ingres, in his old age also relied more and more on color, while Seurat, Ingres' youngest "descendant," delighted—as did Redon—in conté crayon with its dense strokes and velvety blacks. But in the same years during which Seurat established his peculiar style of drawing in tonal masses rather than in line, Toulouse-Lautrec developed his acid and nervous pencil strokes and van Gogh borrowed from the Orient the reed pen for the execution of his linear weavings. Meanwhile Cézanne chose to suppress lines in his landscapes, substituting accords and contrasts of color. His drawings were never exhibited in his lifetime; in his opinion they served only for the solutions of specific problems, and in the end he preferred watercolor even for that.

The personal feeling of these great men about draftsmanship is by no means so clear as the inspiration they provided for modern art in general. Our selection begins with examples of the glorious and various work of these artists, but not so much to show that there was modernity in their draftsmanship as to clarify the retrospective part of the inspiration of the moderns who came after them, and to characterize the schools in which Picasso and Matisse and the others studied; or, to put it more exactly, the traditions in which they schooled themselves. It should be sufficient to recall that when the brilliant eye of Picasso fell upon Negro sculptures and Cézanne's pyramidal hills and the balanced and faceted still life paintings, cubism started; while out of the sardonic exaggerations of Daumier and Toulouse-Lautrec and Degas and the tragic dramatization of van Gogh came expressionism.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

While Bonnard, Vuillard and Segonzac were still developing the impressionist inheritance, there appeared other men who can be loosely grouped together as expressionists—those who have preferred some inner violence of feeling to any formulation of intellect, and have rejected imitative reality rather for freedom's sake than for abstract beauty. Color for them was so much a necessity that they drew very little. The German expressionists sketched a great deal but for the most part in rough unlinear fashion. Rouault has never been primarily a draftsman in the linear sense, although his brushes have created forms through heavy outlines of color while his etchings are based more on the opposition of light and dark tones than on line. Soutine, too, has never been a draftsman, nor have the elder Americans such as Hartley and Weber. Augustus John, an artist notable for his force of personality, is expert in the normal style of British art from the pre-Raphaelite tradition. His emotional impulse is so free as to suggest improvisation, and he is exceptional also in the spirited facility of his linear production.

Matisse is the perfect instance of twentieth-century draftsmanship. For him drawing is an integral factor of his artistic thinking. The beauty of his drawing derives to some extent from a strong decorative faculty but to a far greater degree from the breadth and audacity of his original conception. The extent of his mastery may be observed in the gradual purification of design apparent in successive studies of the same subject. He has said, "Style which is the result of a period's necessities and is determined by exigencies independent of the artist's will, cannot be taught . . . He who really has something to say is driven to it by emotion which induces him to carry out his work in relation to his own qualities." In his drawings no less than his paintings there is always that powerful lyricism, perfectly free, yet with perfect control; for the least sketch has a kind of finality, and the most painstaking composition has brevity and vigor.

The powerful spirit and manifold proficiency of Picasso doubtless is the other most impressive and influential force in contemporary draftsmanship. His work is prodigious and protean. Critics and fellow artists often grow resentful of his easy overlordship in the esthetics of the era; but again and again one finds it incontrovertible. Whatever lack may be felt in one of his styles, he himself is able to compensate for it in his next style, and with greater enthusiasm and rapidity of invention than his rivals. In his youth as dramatic as van Gogh and as tender as Redon; in his early maturity the conspicuous leader of a revolution of taste and pictorial formula by which mere human interest seemed banished; tragic and humane again when Fascist violence swept over his native land—one might well say that the changing spirit of the century is inherent in his work.

The chief innovation to be credited to him is of course cubism. This movement was fortunate in the obvious genius of the master, while his interest in it lasted, but it was unfortunate in the early deaths of La Fresnaye and Gris. Its importance is to be realized not so much in the orthodox practice of it as in its effects and by-products; its prompting of half a dozen other more or less abstract movements—some of which are to be observed in the drawings of Braque, Kandinsky, Arp, Léger and Mondrian—and its thrilling and pervasive influence upon modern art in general. In recent years abstraction has persisted perhaps more vigorously in sculpture than in painting. Brancusi, the great abstract sculptor, is an old man; but Lipchitz and Zadkine, Henry Moore and Calder, and others still evidently have much to say in a manner at once abstract and dramatic.

SCULPTORS' DRAWINGS

The drawings of sculptors seem to deserve separate classification and consideration. Naturally, good sculptors make good draftsmen; for to the eye of the beholder the solid bronze and marble appear as an innumerable succession of linear profiles against surrounding space, boundaries of the voluminous form; and these contours from a given standpoint can be shown on paper as well. But upon second thought one finds that all the categories appropriate to the draftsmanship of painters will serve as well for what the sculptors have done; there is no essential difference between them. Sculpture and painting in our period are closely interlocked; whether abstract or not, they seem to be facets of the same artistic thought. The painters—Degas, Renoir, Matisse and Picasso, for example—have been fond of modeling. Modigliani worked in Brancusi's studio and sculptors like Lipchitz and Zadkine are doubtless beholden to other contemporary painters, while Calder has acknowledged the influence of Mondrian and Miro in the formation of his style.

The drawings of Rodin, incomparably swift and bold in seizing the motion of the model at the moment, are always surprising. They represent the occasional sketch at its best. No one ever took greater liberties with sculpture, and his capacity to imagine and capture movement of form through line may well be one reason for the astonishing effects in his bronzes. By seeking to record the ripple of actual movement—a typically modern kinesthetic idea—Rodin became more abstract in linear form than any of his contemporaries, and his freedom of method has been most rewarding to later artists, particularly painters.

The sculptor naturally thinks in terms of the definition of form, but although the three dimensional aspects may be in his mind's eye, he may be exceedingly elliptical and summarizing in his draftsmanship.

In the drawings of Despiau, however, we find considerable graphic realism. Those of Maillol, on the other hand, all show a search for reality in sculptural terms. Maillol keeps his studio littered with a decade's sketches, maintaining that if drawings are good enough, sculpture can be done from them without further reference to the human model. But he has produced great finished drawings as well, which are rather an equivalent of sculpture than a preparation for it.

SCHOOLS AND STYLES

Amid Picasso's copious production, in which one finds a greater number of bold attempts and odd originalities than in any other modern man's work, one may be amazed to find a seemingly opposite action: his part in different revivals of, and variations upon, the pictorial cultures of centuries past. This is often called pastiche, but this depreciatory term is far too simple. Certainly the love of the past has led Picasso forward as well as temporarily backward. His admiration of Ingres and of Hellenic sculpture was no more imitative than that interest in African sculpture which prompted a good part of cubism. In any case the fault, if it is a fault, is almost universal today. A similar reversion to the values of the museums and academies, now verging upon prettiness, now upon burlesque, has been like an undertow in the modern movement.

One aspect of it no doubt is mere sophistication. This century has inherited the eclecticism of all centuries, the exoticisms of all the continents. Photographic journalism and the publication of inexpensive volumes of art history and reproductions have let in upon the sensibility of contemporary artists a scattering and excitement of knowledge of the past greater than ever and heterogeneous above all.

That brilliant not quite harmonious group of artists who are called fantastic, including the surrealists or dream-realists, show other extremes of culture. Foremost among these are two dreamers of amazing invention and angelic spirit, Redon and Klee, who appear to have kept their thought simple, however unearthly their subject matter or audacious their pictorial inventions. So did Chirico, who, in his youth, was like a sleepwalker straying with an inspiration which in the daylight of later life he could never recover. But there is no such simplicity of thought about the younger men. Just as the decorative style of the last few years is full of the Baroque, so the imagination of Dali is furnished with an astonishing familiarity with psychiatry, orthodox and otherwise; that of Masson with mythology; that of Seligmann with medieval prophecy and black magic; that of Tchelitchev with veritable mysticism and strange science.

Now a word of pride in the state of art in America today, as the survey of draftsmanship shows it, and of apology to those who may argue that our pride is excessive. If originality were the sole consideration, perhaps there is a larger representation of our countrymen in our selections than the disinterested judgment of the matter would admit. Americans have not, by and large, excelled in audacious and imaginative drawings. Two tendencies appear to have been fairly constant in the artistic expression of this country: one is the vigorous informal documentation typified by Pascin and "Pop" Hart; the other is minute fidelity to observed fact which we find in Sheeler and Blume. Americans have also contributed to the development of certain of the modern movements which originated in Paris. For it is a fact that in the last fifty years Paris has been the capital of world art; the initial interpretation of this varies a great deal but the enthusiasms of the artists themselves often refer to Europe. Our conservatives are as faithful in their devotion to Daumier and Renoir, for instance, as our abstract painters are in their devotion to Braque and Gris.

But although American patriotism about art has been proud in spirit, its narrowness of intellectual outlook has sometimes been discouraging in effect. This appears especially in the way Americanism is estimated—far more strictly and exclusively than the French output has been in this century. The School of Paris was only half French. If Picasso, Brancusi, Modigliani, Pascin, Soutine, Chirico, Chagall, Lipchitz, Miro and Dali were Frenchmen in those days, then Léger, Masson, Tanguy, Mondrian, Lipchitz, Ozenfant, Tchelitchev, Berman, Dali and Matta are Americans at the moment; and some of them will not leave us when peace is declared. The New York School of tomorrow may not be very idiosyncratically American but this is an international era, for better or worse; and for art it should be better.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The following bibliography has been prepared as an adjunct to the exhibition which this volume records, and does not include monographs of artists not represented in it. Nor does it list such material as the sales catalogs of Amsler & Ruthardt, Berlin (1924, no.105; 1925, no. 107). The student might first consider Joseph Meder Die Handzeichnung, ihre Technik und Entwicklung (Vienna, Schroll, 1919), Oscar Bie Die moderne Zeichenkunst (Berlin, Bard & Marquardt, 1905?), Jean de Bosschère Essai sur la dialectique du dessin (Bruxelles, van Oest, 1925?), Charles Holme Pen, pencil and chalk (London, Studio, 1903), and Joseph Pennell Pen drawing and pen draughtsmen (New York, Macmillan, 1920). Many modern drawings have been reproduced in series such as Cahiers d'Aujourd'hui, Meister der Zeichnung, Propyläen Kunstgeschichte, Sélection, and in such periodicals as Arts et Métiers Graphiques, Drawing and Design, Graphische Künste, Minotaure, and Verve.
