Adolf Dietrich

Born at Berlingen, on the Swiss side of Lake Constance, November 19, 1877, Adolf Dietrich still lives in his native village. He owns a small house and garden, an acre of land, some fruit trees and a small vineyard. He raises rabbits and collects butterflies.

Dietrich's father wanted him to be a factory worker, a townsman. He spent fourteen years in a factory and then returned to his village and became a parish woodsman. He still practices this trade. He loves it almost as much as painting, and would continue with it even if he were offered a less humble position which would take him away from his beloved trees, his animals and his flowers.

He has always drawn. He was twenty-six when the painter Völmy came from Basle to paint at Berlingen. Dietrich watched him with wonder, and decided to take up painting. That is his whole story. In 1916, in a book called Le Livre de Bodensee, he published some drawings which were noticed by the director of the Museum of Art at Baden. The Museum exhibited them. Later, Mr. Herbert Tannenbaum of Mannheim became interested in Dietrich and was responsible for the acquisition of his work by German museums and many Swiss, German and French private collections.

Dietrich's simple art, precise and energetic, exhales a strong perfume of rustic poetry. It consists of landscapes, figure pieces, still-lifes, flower pictures and portraits of animals.

Jean Eve

Born in 1900, at Somain in the north of France, Jean Eve's first attempts at painting date from his fifteenth year. "No one," he says, "ever taught me anything." He painted, so he thought, for distraction, to escape through an amusing game the difficulties of an apprentice's life. He had no intention of becoming an artist.

Eve did his military service in Syria, but nothing in his work indicates that he remembers it. (At the time he was interested in watercolors and amused himself with a sort of elementary dot-technique.) On his return to France he found employment as an industrial draughtsman, then as book-keeper in a foundry and finally as a mechanic in an automobile factory near Paris. In 1924 he saw the Courbet exhibition in Paris. "It hit me so hard," he says, "that it awoke in me a need to paint in earnest, to remake what I saw."

In 1928 Eve made the acquaintance of Kisling, to whom he had been drawn by a book of Jacques Guenne's. From that time on people began to take notice of him and exhibitions of his work were held. At one point he even left the factory and settled down to paint in the neighborhood of Mantes. But he soon turned homeward and went back to earning a living: he has a wife and children to support, and he would be reluctant to paint unless he had the assurance of being able to provide for them. In 1935, through a competitive examination, Eve succeeded in getting a night-job in the Paris toll-house. This guarantees his livelihood and leaves the day free for his art.

dants and at the Salon de l’Ecole Française. From then until 1935 he exhibited regularly only at the Indépendants, where, in 1934, he showed The Castle of the White Queen and The Divan. There were several of us who acquired the habit of looking for Peyronnet’s pictures at the Indépendants every year, but the first connoisseur to buy several of his canvases was Mme. Cécile Gregory.

In 1936 Peyronnet was represented in the competition for the Paul Guillaume prize by The Ferryman of the Moselle, now in the Gregory Collection. (Plate 43.) No one denies the dramatic strength of this painting. The subject was suggested by a street song based on an episode in the war of 1870: the ferry-man of the Moselle, commanded to transport a German troop across the river, cuts the cable and dies with the enemy rather than betray France.

When The Ferryman of the Moselle was shown in the Paul Guillaume exhibition, Peyronnet heard an obviously incompetent visitor say that he was probably imitating Rousseau. Anxious to discover if this was so, Peyronnet rushed to the Louvre. He returned distressed. He had looked at the paintings of Theodore Rousseau and he could not see how his work resembled them.

Peyronnet imitates no one. With patience, with taste and with the care of a master artisan, he covers his canvas with thousands of little brush strokes. In his simplicity, he believes that he is reproducing with perfect accuracy the world he sees. He does not realize that he is, instead, establishing order and equilibrium in his own soul.

without any recourse to convenient surface ingenuities. This dreamer was a capable workman, able to build his dream into a solid and marvelously balanced reality. This supposed ignoramus knew all that he needed to know about proportions, rhythms, colors and forms: those qualities which form the connecting link between classical masterpieces of every period and every country. He did not know what Giotto was all about. But like Giotto he knew how to subordinate anatomy (that “dreadful science” as Ingres himself called it) to the higher needs of expression, and through the very intensity with which he attacked the problem of literal representation he achieved at one and the same time the particular and the general, the actual and the symbolic.

Note: This is said to be the painting which figured in the lawsuit of January, 1909, when Rousseau was accused of helping to swindle the Bank of France of 21,000 francs. He painted this canvas in order to impress the court with his artistic ability. He was convicted but his obvious innocence of any criminal intention and the fact that this was his first offence caused his light sentence to be suspended.

Louis Vivin

Born in July, 1861, in Hadol, a small village near Epinal, Louis Vivin died in May, 1936, in the modest Montmartre lodging where he had lived for more than fifty years. During all that time Vivin and his wife were unable to consign to the dust-bin any object which had made its way into their home, and their rooms became a sentimental museum of lower middle-class life. I shall never forget their singular charm, any more than I shall forget Vivin himself, bearded like a patriarch, noble and debonair in the midst of his strange bazaar.

One day I noticed a reproduction of Millet’s Angelus pasted on the wall of Vivin’s house. I asked the old man if he admired Millet. “No,” he answered mildly. I persisted. He thought for a long time, examined the picture closely and then presented his verdict: “Don’t you find it a little vulgar?”

The phrase casts a light on Vivin himself, master of an art so scenes filled with people, the backgrounds often painted so abstractly that they are reduced to little more than sets against which the drama of human life is enacted. He also painted still lifes, interiors, hunt meetings and family gatherings. His early work is so adroitly realistic that one could never ascribe the manner characteristic of his later paintings to incompetence or awkwardness. Little by little, Vivin discovered that the only true reality is the reality of thought and feeling, and so we find him taking greater and greater liberties with material considerations, with the laws of perspective and of gravity. Into the crucible of his dream he threw the forms and colors of the common world, and drew forth a marvelous new world in which were blended the poet's spirit and the world we all know, purified and adorned with exquisite colors.
