The People's Art Center of the Museum of Modern Art, 21 West 53rd Street is opening its 18th year of classes for children and young people from three to eighteen, on September 19.

The classes organized by age group, not by skill or ability, are held once a week. A variety of creative experiences including painting, clay-work and three-dimensional constructions are taught to the younger children. The classes for young people are principally devoted to painting.

Classes are also given for parents and children who want to explore the arts together and work with clay, make wire figures, and "feeling" pictures. All the teachers are specially trained for the age level they teach and many are nationally known for their contributions to art education. The school is under the direction of Victor D'Amico, head of the Museum's Department of Education.

Registration and payment of fees should be completed by September 16 for the Fall Term. Applications will be taken for any vacancies in classes up to the first week of the term.

The People's Art Center office is located on the second floor of the building adjoining the Museum of Modern Art, at 21 West 53rd Street. For further information come to the office or phone Judson 2-5255.
