HAL B. WALLIS: FILM PRODUCER
NINE WEEK MUSEUM RETROSPECTIVE

At a time when the film director is in the limelight, The Museum of Modern Art is shifting attention to the important though sometimes overlooked role of producer with the presentation of HAL B. WALLIS: FILM PRODUCER.

The nine-week Wallis retrospective, which opens November 18 with "The Dawn Patrol" and concludes January 12 with Wallis' latest film "Red Sky at Morning," includes 43 films selected from 400 Wallis productions made over the last four decades. Five hundred invited guests will attend a reception for Mr. Wallis the night before the opening of the retrospective.

Among the well-known films to be shown in the series, assembled by Adrienne Mancia, Associate Curator of the Department of Film, are: "Little Caesar," "I am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang," "Gold Diggers of 1933," "The Story of Louis Pasteur," "The Maltese Falcon," "Casablanca," "Yankee Doodle Dandy," and "Jezebel," all films well received in their time and all representative of different genres. For Wallis, honored by the British Film Institute last year, recipient of no less than two Irving Thalberg Awards and 32 Academy Awards, is basically considered a master-of-all-genres. He functioned in the most productive years of the American cinema, when a producer, having accepted the challenge of an unknown type of film, moved into a newer and still more challenging area.

Over the years Wallis has devoted his talents to socially relevant themes, westerns, biographies, historical films, musicals, and gangster pictures. He has also collaborated with some of America's most distinguished film directors: William Dieterle, William Wyler, Michael Curtiz, Edmund Goulding, Busby Berkeley, Raoul Walsh, John Huston and Howard Hawks.

"Gun Fight at OK Corral," relating the classic gun battle in Tombstone, Arizona, (more) is typical of Western mythology. "They Died with Their Boots On," with General Custer portrayed by Errol Flynn, also falls into this category as does "True Grit," a frontier fable, and a still-to-be-released Wallis film, "Red Sky at Morning."

In the area of adventure Wallis gained fame for "Captain Blood," known for its duel scene with Basil Rathbone. This film made Errol Flynn, as a swashbuckling pirate, a full-fledged star. The picture, however, does not have the following of "Casablanca," with the fabled Humphrey Bogart opposite Ingrid Bergman and the two arch villains Peter Lorre and Sydney Greenstreet. "Casablanca" has become what is called a cult film.

Neither the western nor adventure film established the reputation of Wallis to the extent of his gangster epic "Little Caesar," with Edward C. Robinson in a megalomaniacal rise to power. The picture featured a speed, vigor, violence and gunplay that was startling, though typical of its time.

With "I am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang," directed by Mervyn Le Roy, Wallis concentrated on a topical problem as brutal and realistic as gangsterism. Le Roy had also directed "Little Caesar," and later moved on to more frivolous matters like "Gold Diggers of 1933," designed to distract depression audiences. Busby Berkeley was responsible for the kaleidoscopic chorus effects and musical numbers with Ruby Keeler, Dick Powell, Ginger Rogers and Joan Blondell.

Perhaps the most unique film in Wallis' career is his version of Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with "the most extraordinary cast that ever ill met by moonlight for bucolic reveries, among them James Cagney, Mickey Rooney, Joe E. Brown, Hugh Herbert, Olivia de Havilland and Dick Powell." Mr. Wallis has said the single most important thing in motion picture making is the casting.

Biography seems to have been Hal Wallis' forte, if one considers the number of such films he has produced, like "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet," dealing with the then publicly taboo subject of syphilis. Paul Muni played the famous doctor.

In "Sergeant York," it was Gary Cooper who portrayed the pacifist hero, and though (more) exceedingly popular then, the picture now owes its importance to "its complex religious theme and extraordinary visual qualities that make it one of the most stylistically interesting of Howard Hawks' films."

In the biographical genre, Wallis also produced "The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex," starring Bette Davis as a middle-aged woman in love with a younger man; "Becket," with Richard Burton and Peter O'Toole; and "Anne of the Thousand Days," an adaptation from the play by Maxwell Anderson. "Juarez" represents still another biography in the Wallis dossier.

Hal Brent Wallis started to work at 14 as an office boy in a real estate firm. An avid reader and night student, he later became a salesman and graduated to a theater manager. In the latter capacity he attracted attention and moved on to assistant publicist, then head of studio publicity at Warner Brothers. He is said to have coined the famous phrase "the Lubitsch Touch" and among other publicity feats he publicized "The Jazz Singer."

Later as studio manager, production executive and then head of studio production, he had ample opportunity to exercise his imagination and initiative. He introduced Bogart, Flynn, Edward G. Robinson, Olivia de Havilland, Burt Lancaster and, not to be forgotten, Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin.

In the opinion of Wallis, popularity and aesthetics are not antithetical. As a result he has combined box office with prestige and his pictures, while successful, have reflected personal taste and judgment. "You can't make a picture by a computer," says Mr. Wallis. "A good picture is a good picture, no matter what generation makes it, and conversely a bad picture is bad, regardless of the vintage."
