PIONEER FILM DIRECTOR HONORED
BY MUSEUM OF MODERN ART

Allan Dwan, at 86 one of America's oldest living directors and with over 400 films to his credit, will be honored with a five-week film retrospective beginning March 4 at The Museum of Modern Art. The series, assembled by Peter Bogdanovich, a filmmaker himself, spans 45 years of the director's career, from the 1912 film "The Fear" to "The River's Edge," a 1957 Western and one of Dwan's last films. Mr. Bogdanovich is the author of the new book_Allan Dwan: The Last Pioneer_, published by Praeger concurrently with the Museum series.

Allan Dwan has directed such noted stars as Gloria Swanson, Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., Victor McLaglen, Wallace Beery, Shirley Temple and John Wayne. Some of his most well-known pictures, included in the Museum tribute, are "Robin Hood," a 1922 film with Douglas Fairbanks, Sr.; "The Iron Mask" (1929), also starring Fairbanks; "Suez" (1938), the epic with Tyrone Power and Loretta Young; and "The Sands of Iwo Jima" (1949), the war film for which John Wayne received his first Oscar nomination.

Allan Dwan, who has worked in many genres, began his career in motion pictures almost by accident. An engineer, he designed special lights for the Essanay Studio in Chicago and was supervising their use on the set, when he learned that the studio paid $25 for scripts. He began writing with such success that he was asked to be Essanay's scenario editor. Arriving on a set in Arizona to supply some scripts, he found that the director had left town and was soon notified by Essanay that he was to direct. This was in 1909 and Dwan stayed with the job for more than half a century.

Dwan's early films, such as "Three Million Dollars"(1911), his (more) fortieth one-reeler, are technically very simple—each scene is recorded from a fixed position and there is a minimum of cutting. By 1913, however, he felt the influence of D. W. Griffith and began to cut within scenes and introduce much greater flexibility. Dwan himself has acknowledged his debt to Griffith: "The only man I ever watched was Griffith, and I just did what he did. It was a wonderful, successful thing to do." Dwan came up with numerous solutions to technical problems himself, and Bogdanovich credits him with the invention of the dolly shot in 1915.

"Robin Hood" (1922), starring Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., remains one of Dwan's greatest films. Robert E. Sherwood, the playwright, then a film critic, wrote at the time "It represents the high-water mark of film production."

Dwan had a very close association with the two leading stars of the 20s, Fairbanks and Gloria Swanson. "Manhandled," a 1924 film starring Miss Swanson, will be shown at the Museum. It is a comedy romance with an outstanding performance by the leading lady.

While he has always felt that sound detracted from what he considers a uniquely visual medium, Dwan made the transition to talkies with success. Given little opportunity in the mid-thirties to work with superior material, the success of two Shirley Temple films he directed—"Heidi" and "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm"—led to his assignment to direct "Suez," a 1938 adventure story built around the construction of the Suez Canal, and a film which remains one of his best. After making a number of successful comedies in the forties, he switched genres with his usual ability and closed out the decade with the successful "The Sands of Iwo Jima," a war film starring John Wayne.

Dwan continued working actively until the early 60s. His films are marked by expressive but unpretentious camera work; a sense of humor which pokes fun at pretense; and a focus on simple people.
