Bellini believes that present day cars are uncomfortable spaces where strapped-in people cannot fully enjoy the sensorial pleasure of movement in open space. Moreover he is skeptical of present day trailers which, though designed for mobility, nevertheless neglect to develop that aspect of the design in exchange for a "home-sweet-home" on four wheels. His prototype measuring about 8 feet by 20, is in reality a transparent box made of steel and glass, with a roof and walls which can ascend from a traveling height of four feet to a usable height of seven feet. When this occurs, most of the driver's paraphernalia becomes hidden and the Kar-a-Sutra becomes a place with no fixed position where a family can rearrange specially designed form-conserving cushions in any manner and pattern they choose. It has no bath or kitchen, for it does not attempt to be anything else than an exploration capsule which could be rented at the sea or in the mountains once one has arrived there, Bellini hopes, by means of public transportation. His design, therefore, also implies a clear urban concept, reserving for the car the role of connector between city points and assigning the service of public transportation between cities to public means.
