RAOUL WALSH TO ATTEND OPENING OF RETROSPECTIVE TRIBUTE AT MUSEUM

Raoul Walsh, 87-year-old film director whose career in motion pictures spanned more than five decades, will come to New York for the opening of a three-month retrospective of his films beginning Thursday, April 18, at The Museum of Modern Art. In a rare public appearance Mr. Walsh will attend the 8 pm screening of "Gentleman Jim," his 1942 film in which Errol Flynn portrays the boxing champion James J. Corbett.

One of the giants of American filmdom, Walsh has worked in all genres -- Westerns, gangster films, war pictures, adventure films, musicals -- and with many of Hollywood's greatest stars -- Victor McLaglen, Gloria Swanson, Douglas Fairbanks, Mae West, James Cagney, Humphrey Bogart, Marlene Dietrich and Edward G. Robinson, to name just a few. It is ultimately as a director of action pictures that Walsh is best known and a growing body of critical opinion places him in the front rank with directors like Ford, Hawks, Curtiz and Wellman. Richard Schickel has called him "one of the best action directors...we've ever had" and British film critic Julian Fox has written: "Raoul Walsh, more than any other legendary figure from Hollywood's golden past, has truly lived up to the early cinema's reputation for 'action all the way'...."

Walsh's penchant for action is not surprising considering he began his career more than 60 years ago as a stunt-rider in early "westerns" filmed in the New Jersey hills. D. W. Griffith saw Walsh in one of these roles and took him to California in 1910. Walsh played John Wilkes Booth in "Birth of a Nation" and continued to act periodically until he sustained an eye injury while playing the (over) Cisco Kid in his film "In Old Arizona" in 1929. He began assisting Griffith with directorial duties shortly after their arrival in California and Walsh helped direct "The Life of General Villa" (1912), which he also wrote and in which he acted. One of the participants in this semi-documentary was Villa himself.

Of his career as an actor, Walsh has said: "As an actor I was a real ham, not any good. I didn't want any part of it, really; I wanted to get into directors.
After "The Life of General Villa" he directed a string of two-reelers before making "The Regeneration" (1915), a realistic depiction of tenement life on New York's Lower East Side. Four years later he directed a version of Longfellow's poem "Evangeline." Praised by critics, the picture was not a commercial success. "I decided then to play to Main Street and to hell with art," Walsh has said.

Walsh's popularity declined in the early 1920s but in 1924 he came back with the successful "The Thief of Bagdad" starring Douglas Fairbanks. Julian Fox con­siders this spectacle of swashbuckling adventure "probably the most truly magical entertainment of the whole silent era." Walsh's biggest commercial success of the 20s came two years later with "What Price Glory?", from the Broadway hit by Laurence Stallings and Maxwell Anderson. Though it contained some excitingly staged battle scenes as well as moments of tragedy, it revolved around the often humorous rivalry between two brawling marines who were portrayed by Edmund Lowe and Victor McLaglen. The pairing of Lowe and McLaglen was so successful that they appeared in several Walsh-directed sequels, "The Cock-Eyed World" (1929), "Women of All Nations" (1931), and "Under Pressure" (1935), all of which are included in the Museum's program.

In 1928 Walsh directed Gloria Swanson in "Sadie Thompson," from the Maughan story of a prostitute adrift in the tropics and a man of the cloth (Lionel Barrymore) who secretly covets her. Walsh made his last appearance as an actor in this picture, playing the part of an American marine. Gloria Swanson has recalled: "I had better luck with 'Sadie' than any other movie star because I had the advantage of making a good silent of it. If you have to censor Sadie's language, how can you really portray her?" While the inter-titles were discreet, the game of reading the star's lips was known as the "cuss-word puzzle" according to Kevin Brownlow.

Walsh's first talkie was "In Old Arizona" (1929), filmed entirely on location in Zion County, Utah. After injuring his eye Walsh stepped down from the role of the Cisco Kid and his replacement, Warner Baxter, subsequently won an Oscar for the portrayal. Two years later he made "The Yellow Ticket," set in Czarist Russia in 1913, a strongly anti-Russian adventure of a young woman forced into prostitution due to the social ills of her country.

Among Walsh's many later successes were "The Roaring Twenties" (1939), with James Cagney and Humphrey Bogart as rival bootleggers during Prohibition; "They Drive by Night" (1940), starring Bogart and George Raft as long-distance truckers and featuring Ida Lupino in a performance which earned her a seven-year contract with Warners; "High Sierra" (1941), with Bogart as a disillusioned gangster planning one last job; "Objective Burma" (1945), a war film starring Errol Flynn which aroused British ire due to its exaggeration of the American war effort in Burma; "White Heat" (1949), featuring Cagney in a brilliant portrayal of a psychopathic killer; and "A Lion Is in the Streets" (1953), a drama about the rise and corruption of a Southern politician, with Cagney as the Huey Long-inspired character.

In addition to Walsh's own pictures, the Museum will present a documentary on Walsh written, produced and directed by film critic Richard Schickel. The 90-minute portrait of Walsh will be shown two consecutive Wednesdays, April 17 and 24, at noon, and two Thursdays, April 18 and 25, at 2 pm. The director's autobiography, Each Man in His Time, will be published in August by Farrar Straus and Giroux.

The Walsh retrospective has been organized by Larry Kardish, Assistant Curator of Film. Several films in the series -- "The Cock-Eyed World," "The Red Dance," "In Old Arizona," "What Price Glory?", "The Yellow Ticket" and "The Man Who Came Back" -- have been preserved as the result of an ongoing agreement between the Museum and 20th Century-Fox by which that company gives the Museum access to its early films for the purpose of selecting, transferring from nitrate to tri-acetate, and storing pictures which might otherwise be lost.
