OF LIGHT AND TEXTURE: TWO AMERICAN FILMMAKERS AT MoMA

During the past fifteen years, independent American filmmakers, more than ever, explored cinema's formal properties. The richest areas of these investigations were within two of film's basic and interrelated means of expression -- light and texture.

Two American independent filmmakers whose works are not only beautiful in themselves but of significant interest to anyone concerned with the nature of film are JAMES HERBERT of Athens, Georgia, and ANDREW NOREN of New York. An exhibition of their work, presented under the title OF LIGHT AND TEXTURE: ANDREW NOREN AND JAMES HERBERT, will take place at MoMA's Roy and Niuta Titus Auditorium from June 11 - 23, 1981.

Although the work of each artist is certainly distinctive and peculiar to himself, they share an uncommon ability to invest the ordinary appearances of everyday life -- windows, shadows, skin -- with a luminosity and grace. Both filmmakers shoot their own work from available light and eschew sound; Noren captures images and moments spontaneously and intuitively, while Herbert manipulates the film's imagery and light and textural qualities through hand-worked rephotography.

"The regard," according to Larry Kardish, Associate Curator and director of the exhibition, "is for the sensuous moving image... finding the nature of film ever surprising, they celebrate the reaction of the grain to light and the actual making of the evanescent image. To the extent that structure is revealed and process given its due is the illusion made richer; curiously, this fundamental acknowledgement only heightens the mystery of their works."

James Herbert uses the nude human form as a pallette; his nudes are photographed, the footage is rephotographed, and the finished films are lyrical but unsentimental, detached but not clinical, and romantically sensual without prurience. Fourteen of Herbert's films will be exhibited in five programs, including his celebrated Porch Glider (1969) and a new work as yet untitled. James Herbert will be present to introduce his films Thursday, June 18 at 6:00 pm.

Andrew Noren's creative process is as disciplined as Herbert's, but the essence of both his modus operandi and its end result is immediacy, a direct capturing of a shadow or a moment. Noren never attempts to recreate an image or rework the results. His images fit according to a flexible rhyme based on light, movement and gesture. The images are caught by Noren's camera which he wears as one would a watch. His approach is aptly stated in his self-appointed nicknames of "light thief" and "shadow bandit." All four parts of Noren's ongoing monumental work The Adventures of the Exquisite Corpse (1967- ) will be screened as well as his key The Wind Variations (1968). Noren will introduce his work Thursday, June 11 at 6:00 pm.

A booklet on OF LIGHT AND TEXTURE, written by Larry Kardish, will be on sale in the MoMA bookstore.

Andrew Noren: "...
So, light nets, traps for shadow captured, charged with darkness, charged with lightness disguised as figures, imprisoned in the grains raging in the cage of the frame."

James Herbert: "Wallace Stevens has a quote from Mario Rossi at the beginning of one of his poems; 'the great interests of man: air and light, the joy of having a body, the voluptuousness of looking...'"
