Photographic Murals

The Exhibition of Mural Painting with which the Museum of Modern Art will open its new building at 11 West 53rd Street in the early part of May will be distinguished by a new development in medium technique. Besides the thirty-five painters who have been invited to design panels, eight photographers will show examples of photo-murals. The art of the photo-mural is a comparatively new one. It started merely by the enlargement of photographic prints on to a large surface and attaching them on to a Guin wall similarly to wall paper. But now various refinements in the technique have been realized and photographers have realized the importance of a greater flexibility in the medium. Instead of merely flashing up simple enlargements, various arrangements and combinations in mounting, or montage have emerged. For example, through a snapshot of the girders of skyscrapers, the white sky will be cut away and scenes of New York life will be inserted. Through superimpositions, double exposures and negative printing, many interesting features will be demonstrated.

Edward Steichen, well known for his portraits in Vanity Fair, will show an idea of the new George Washington Bridge; Berenice Abbott will show the girders of New York described above; Robert Locher and Drix Duryea will show an abstract composition; George Lynes will experiment with color. Charles Sheeler, photographer of the Ford plant in Detroit and Chartes Cathedral, and several others as yet unannounced will also show. These exhibits will be hung in a room to themselves so as not to compete unnecessarily with the actual mural paintings.
